FOREWORD

We live in an age of increasing knowledge and growing unbelief. Rightly viewed, knowledge, while it dispels ignorance, deepens mystery. The world in which we live is a mystery. It is not all that there is. It cannot explain itself. It cannot have created itself. It is ordered, alive and advancing, and it is all this because it is indwelt by the Supreme Spirit. īśā vāsyam idam sarvam. These ideas are accepted by many of us, while they mould the mind and fashion the life of a few. These latter are the saints of mankind. When we read their lives, we come face to face with the reality and power of religion. Tukārāma and Rāmadāsa are well known saints of our country.

Two years ago Paṇḍitā Kshamā Row, who is recognised as a gifted Sanskrit writer, gave us the life of Tukārāma in Sanskrit verses. This new book gives the life of Rāmadāsa which, I hope, will appeal to Sanskrit readers not only for the nobility of its theme but also for the grace and charm of its style.

LIFE OF SRI RAMDAS

CANTO I

1. After the foreign invasion three hundred years ago, when religion had declined in the Maharashtra, there appeared on earth, an incarnation of the wise *Hanuman, to protect the oppressed.
2. The source of rivers, hidden somewhere on a mountain, long remains obscure, like the Parijat in the ocean.
3. When, however, the rivers, in their depth and width, rush headlong into the foaming ocean, they attract the eye of a passer-by and fill him with astonishment.
4. So does the family of a saint, having long remained unknown, blaze forth by his virtues to immortal fame.
5. Blessed is the beautiful Maharashtra, illumined as it was by the noble deeds of great sages like Namdev and others and valiant heroes like Shivaji.
6. Here flows the Godavari, beautiful like the heavenly river (Ganga), whose banks were once sanctified by the dust of Rama's lotus-feet.
7. On her banks there is a village called Jambh, where lived a thousand years ago a priest named Thosar, with his sons and grand-sons.
8. Three hundred years ago, Suryajipant of the twenty-second generation, raised the family to prominence, as the sun opens out a lotus at dawn.

* Maruti, the monkey-god.

9. As a chakor follows the moon-beams, he followed the priestly profession of his ancestors, who were devoted to Rama's feet as bees to a lotus.
10. Through God's favour, or perhaps through his own or his father's merit, he became a learned man and lived with his wife Renudevi ever in contemplation of God.
11. The saintly priest and his wife, leading a life of contentment, had a vision of the divine couple, Rama and Sita, with the brilliance of a thousand suns.
12. The self-restrained couple carried on with due respect every single duty prescribed by the ancient sages for a householder.
13. No wonder that not only the whole village respected them, but even people from other villages who visited their home, honoured them.
- 14, 15. In course of time two sons were born to them, as the Sun and Moon to Heaven and Sea. They had lovable qualities, they were to prove far-shining lights of their family. Great men are born only of pious parents.
16. The two sons' birth proved the merit of Suryajipant and Renudevi as the shining streak on the touch-stone proves the purity of gold.
17. As foretold by a seer and blessed by elders, Renudevi gave birth to her first son, as formerly Vinata to Garud.
18. It was said that the boy's birth was the fruit of the parents' visiting sacred places ; that it was also due to Ganga's grace ; hence was he named Gangadhar.

19. Saint Eknath living then at Paithan called him Jyestha (elder) as he actually was ; later, he was known as S'restha.
20. Intensely devotional by nature like his father, he was initiated at the age of nine, when by the grace of God, he gave himself up to ceaseless contemplation.
21. Eknath had already told Suryajipant that Maruti of divine power, would soon be born to him.
22. So he and other saints of the Maharashtra, while awaiting the incarnation of Maruti, filled the earth with his praises.
23. On the auspicious ninth day of the month of chaitra—Sri Rama's birth anniversary—Suryajipant was absorbed from sunrise in reciting Vedic hymns.
24. Then, as the sun was shining in the middle of the sky, and as Vishnu's image was being sprinkled with petals of flowers by the devotee, his wife gave birth to a jewel of a son, just at the moment when Kaushalya had given birth to Rama.
25. Suryajipant, now doubly jubilant over the two great birth festivities, celebrated the day with prayers and distribution of sweets to the entire village.
26. As the infant shone with a peculiar lustre, the father called him Narayan. Later, he became known as Ramdas and also as Samartha.
27. With a fair complexion, a lovely body, and new-moon-like lustre, the boy growing day by day brought abundant joy to the parents.

28. Suryajipant once went with his family to Paithan to see Saint Eknath after visiting sacred places on the way.
 29. The fore-sighted Eknath, who had already foretold the Brahman of his second son's birth, soon learnt of his arrival and was mightily pleased.
 30. The sage offered them due welcome, and lifting the twelve-month-old babe, hugged him, and kissed his chin again and again.
 31. With exuberant affection the sage pressed the infant to his heart, knowing by spiritual light that he was an incarnation of Maruti. He was beside himself with joy ; tears streamed forth from his eyes; he began to dance; and the infant burst out laughing.
 32. Presently, he said to the parents : "My friend, blessed are you by the birth of this son. Blessed also is she whose womb bore him. Your good family now shines forth by the brilliance of this noble figure.
 33. "You have been unswerving in your devotion to Rama's lotus-feet, my friend; your merit has brought into your family a man of wonderful power. He will found a new era; he will attain fame; he will save his countrymen from the tyranny of a foreign yoke, and elevate them.
 34. "He will extend the work of spiritual uplift that I so heartily began long ago, and will thereby establish swarajya in the Maharashtra. Now let the final curtain of my life be lowered." Soon after Eknath vanished.

CANTO II

1. Suryajipant's smiling son hardly ever cried as an infant. A lion's cub doth not yelp like a jackal.
2. Growing day by day, he in due course attained boyhood like a seedling blooming into a flower.
3. Adept in all games of stick and ball, as also in fist fights on the banks of the Godavari, he easily beat other boys.
4. Enjoying adventurous pastimes, he climbed a tree adroitly, and jumped from its high top into the river, much to the amazement of his comrades.
- 5, 6, 7. Sometimes, wandering alone, he would enter a forest fearlessly and remain there, listening to the warbling of birds, or to the humming of bees. He would watch with interest eccentric pranks of monkeys, as though he remembered their companionship in his previous life, and would spend the whole day in the woods, not thinking of his food or drink. Sometimes in summer, he would dive into the crystal waters of the river and after a swim linger on its banks pensively.
- 8, 9. When his mother tried to scare him with stories of ghosts, the fearless rambler would be amused and roar with laughter. On the contrary, he grew more and more fearless and venturesome. A spark of fire scattered on hay, must spread out in a blaze.
- 10, 11. Other boys of the village, being greatly attached to him, became his constant companions, and he shone out as their leader, as did Maruti at the head of monkey soldiers. The innocent pranks of these playful children were reminiscent of those of the monkey army described by the poet in the Ramayana in beautiful verse.

12, 13. The lads of the village, out of affection for their leader, did what he asked them to do, jumping swiftly from one tree to another, swimming across the river and climbing lofty peaks of hills. He, their honoured leader, fearlessly planned a fresh venture every day and urged his comrades to follow him.

14. One early morning unnoticed by his parents, little Narayana slipped out of his home and wandering alone from forest to forest, reached a lonely spot.

15—18. Thirsty after the fatiguing ramble, he drank the cold water of a mountain spring. Then, as he sat under a tree gazing at the natural beauty of the spot, an immense but gentle-faced monkey coming softly behind him, lifted the astonished boy on to his back and with a quick bounce, went along the forest path. The boy was carried by the strange monkey from one forest to another, then across the river, until they reached a lonely thicket where he saw an uncommon spectacle. The monkey stood stock-still for a moment at the sight of a palanquin carried by four men and surrounded by others.

19—22. In the handsome vehicle sat a resplendent couple, a man with a dark but noble mien and his lovely wife. As soon as the former saw Narayana, he beckoned to the monkey king who, obeying his command, promptly placed the boy before him. Lovingly the dark visitant caressed the child's head crowned with curly hair and put in his hand a letter, sealed with Rama's name. The boy wondered if that personage was actually Rama himself descended to the earth to favour a devotee of his friend Maruti.

23, 24. As Narayana received the epistle, he was seized with a tremor; he lost his speech, he wept, he laughed, he danced. Gradually he became aware that the wondrous apparition had vanished, and that he was alone in a forest far from his village.

25, 26, 27. After the boy's disappearance that morning, his home remained shrouded in gloom like the sky when the rising sun is hidden behind a cloud at the approach of monsoon. The frantic mother cried, while the father racked with anxiety, set out in quest of Narayana. He went with his friends to every spot frequented by the boy on the hills, in the valleys, and finally reached a wood.

28, 29, 30. Seeing the boy in a distant corner of the forest, he thanked God and trembling, somehow reached the spot. His whole being throbbing with love and tears filling his eyes, he rushed to embrace his son, but the latter remained utterly passive. As though suddenly awakened from a dream, his eyes wide open, his senses gone, he only breathed and stared, seeing nothing.

31—34. The father spoke endearing words, friends bantered again and again but the boy stood still, rigid, unwinking, as though he did not recognise his people. Seeing this transformation in his son, the frantic father exclaimed: "Alack! Alack! My son is seized with some strange malady." Some friends said he was gripped by evil spirits, others surmised that he was under the spell of a ghost and that only an exorcizer could cure him by chanting mantras.

35. Presently a young man carried him home swiftly, and relieving the mother of her distress, brought joy to the family again.
- 36, 37. When the boy's closed fist was opened, the epistle given to him by the visitant, which he had preserved carefully so long, was disclosed. And as Suryajipant read the snow-white letter sealed with Rama's name, both his sons, listening to its contents, were soon lost in a reverie.
38. In course of time, the father invested his son with the sacred thread, then, to wean him from his childish pranks, took him to a teacher for his early instruction.
- 39, 40, 41. Later, he found a little girl as dainty as a bud to whom he married his elder son, who was yet a boy. This fine little daughter-in-law, Parvati, served her mother-in-law Renudevi, as the Vasantika creeper serves to enhance the glory of spring. Soon after, Suryaji left the mortal coil to join his forbears in the next world.
- 42, 43. Renudevi bore bravely the loss of her husband out of her love for her sons, as a creeper detached from a tree is seen alive merely for the growth of flowers and fruit. To soothe her in her sorrow at her husband's death her two sons showered her with affection, and gladdened her heart with tender, pleasing words.

CANTO III

1. Narayana, studying at the primary school five or six years surpassed in intellect, not only his class-mates, but even his teacher.

- 2, 3. Highly pleased with his brilliance, the teacher went to the elder brother and said, "O gentle one ! Your little brother deserves to have Brihaspati for a teacher. He has mastered his mother-tongue and I am now incapable of teaching him any more. Can a tiny spark illuminate the sky ?
- 4, 5, 6. "He will himself acquire the knowledge of entire S'astras. What indeed is unattainable to a gifted person ? Didn't the resourceful monkey-king cross the ocean without a boat ? Therefore, send this talented boy to a learned master. An expert alone can polish a precious diamond." So saying, the teacher blessed the elder brother and left his house. Thereafter, Narayana remained at home, pursuing his studies by himself.
- 7—12. Before his father's death, the elder son had founded an ashram in the village where he taught his little pupils various principles of ethics and quietly initiated the most deserving. Seeing the initiated youths, Narayana, even at an early age wanted to be initiated, and begged his brother to fulfil his wish. The latter, however, said, "Narayana, you must not be in a hurry. Even the moon awaits perfection of her digits. You, with your great intelligence, will certainly get what you desire some day by God's grace, as Uttanpad's son Dhruva attained the Highest place even in his childhood." But the elder brother's words had no effect on Narayana's mind as formerly Narad muni's advice on that of Dhruva who wished to practise penance to gain Hari's favour. And determined to be initiated, he hastened to Hanuman's temple. Great men reveal intense determination even in childhood.
- 13—15. There, with fervent devotion, his eyes streaming with tears, he passed a major portion of the night praying to Maruti in verse after verse. His intense fervour reached a height far beyond his tender age. Streams of tears from his face were dried up by heat, his throat was parched by continuous chanting. Finally, his body completely exhausted, he fell down on the dark floor in a swoon.

- 16, 17. At midnight, a flash of dazzling light from the interior of the shrine, aroused him from deep slumber. When awake, the astonished boy sprang up in a moment, and beheld in front of him Anjana's smiling son* encircled by a halo.
- 18, 19. His eyes wide with amazement, the boy prostrated himself before Maruti, whose feet he bathed with tears of joy. Then, a sound issued through the interior of the shrine to indicate that the earth had become replete with joyous fervour.
- 20, 21. The kindly Maruti, greatly pleased with the boy's intense faith, immediately made him see Sri Rama in person. The boy's heart was overwhelmed with wonder. As he saw the blinding light of the Lord, the like of which he had never seen before, he stood stock-still sweating, as Dhruva in front of God.
- 22—25. Presently, Rama got Maruti to advise and initiate him and Himself enlightened his mind with His divine radiance. Placing His hand on the boy's head, He uttered these nectar-like words: "The whole country is desecrated by mlechchas. Therefore, to bring happiness to my people, I command thee to renounce self-interest and practise a severe penance on the sacred banks of the Krishna. Thou shalt carry on fervent worship of Me and spread it among atheists." Saying this in a deep and divine voice, the mass of dazzling halo vanished. The boy remained thrilled.

*Maruti.

- 26, 27. Meantime, the elder brother, after wandering in the forest and on the banks of the river, went into Maruti's temple where he found Narayana, his face radiant after the initiation. He stood a moment staring at the boy, then, as the latter opened his eyes, embraced him affectionately, took him home and immersed his mother in an ocean of joy.
28. In later years, Narayana described this strange incident humorously in Marathi verse, using the well-known metre Abhanga.
- 29, 30. "Our parents were selflessly devoted to Rama, chanting His name constantly. God's worship was the only legacy our father left, to be divided between us both. But alas, my elder brother coveting the entire inheritance, took not only his own, but my share also. Therefore, I left home and acquired this worship myself as also the state of bondage of Sri Rama. Blessed be our family !"
- 31, 32, 33. Thenceforth, Narayana remained quiet and showed signs of detachment. Indeed, this tendency peculiar to the family, was the touchstone of their greatness. The mother thought the snow-white purity of his character turned him from worldly pleasures and made him averse to marriage. And she longed to see her nine-year-old son married. Women generally like to have a daughter-in-law.
- 34, 35. She told a priest her intention, and got his approval in the matter. Priests, out of self-interest catch simple youths into the meshes of marriage. But all their efforts proved futile like those of the clouds hurled by Indra on the mountain lifted by Lord Krishna in the Vrindavan.

36—39. “The boy, perplexed and distressed, once slipped out of the house quietly and stayed in a solitary place to avoid his mother’s persistence. And forgetting his food, drink, play and sleep, he remained two or three days near a well, thinking as to how to escape from the ties of matrimony. Then, suddenly, as he saw his companions in the distance, he climbed instantly the nearest tree. Soon, his comrades reached the spot and asked loudly, “Why have you deserted your people, and taken to the life of a monkey ?

40, 41, 42. “Giving up your prayers and other duties, why are you jumping from tree to tree like an animal ? Would a king’s steed leave his splendid stable and resort to a washerman’s yard ? And how long will you remain on a tree hanging on to its branches like a monkey ? A young man does not avoid a maiden out of fear, but seeks her out of love. Were you born crazy ? Or is this due to your association with mad monkeys ? Milk when mixed with water and other liquids, loses its inherent quality.”

43, 44. Thus ridiculed by the indiscreet boys, Narayana, burning with anger at the insult, rashly threw himself from the tree down into the well. Terrified by the occurrence, some of his companions vanished like the wind, lest they should be accused of the boy’s murder.

45, 46. Presently, an expert swimmer among them quickly dived into the well to save his friend, but his long, strenuous search was as futile as a search for water in a desert. Finally, distressed by the conviction that Narayana had drowned himself, the brave lad went away immediately to inform Narayana’s people.

47—50. Hearing the unexpected news, Renudevi was sunk in a chaos of grief and, consoled by her elder son, she started with him for the well. Stumbling on the way in her panic, trembling and sinking, her eyes dim with tears; she could hardly walk the long distance. Fearing that his poor mother would not be able to reach the spot, and that delay might end in disaster, the son lifted her in his arms, saying, "Mother, don't torture your frail body with grief. I feel sure that by Rama's infinite mercy my brother is safe."

51. Although thus assured tenderly at every step, she could not bear for a moment the agony of separation from her beloved younger son.
- 52, 53. Finally, they reached the spot and approaching the edge of the well, the elder son said loudly, "Come out, child, look, I have come with mother." No sooner was he called by his brother, than the boy came out of the well. His companions were astounded, his mother thrilled with excessive joy.
54. With his garments drenched, his handsome face bent down, the boy fell at her feet. Then, taking her trembling hand, he followed his elder brother who set out homewards.

CANTO IV

- 1—3. Alarmed by the recent event, the elder son said to his mother, "Please, mother, don't persist in forcing my brother to marry. He will vanish again and that will be tragic. So leave him alone as he is so averse to matrimony. Marriage by compulsion does not lead to happiness. You know how Cupid was destroyed. Not only was his attempt at alluring foiled, but he was rendered bodyless by Siva."

4, 5. Renudevi, thus advised by her elder son, slackened her persistence although she had set her heart on her project. And Narayana, believing that his mother thought no more about it, felt as happy as an untamed elephant, when a strong chain about to be tied to his feet is taken away.

6—11. And now that he had been initiated through Divine favour or his own merit, he constantly wondered when he would be his Lord's bond-slave. He read during the day the ennobling story of the Ramayana and at night dreamed of episodes of the great epic—sometimes of Rama's boyish games with his three brothers, at other times of Rama's wonderful feats of archery, of the two brothers' journey with Vishvamitra to his hermitage infested by demons, of the lovely forest plateaus crowded with beautiful deer which the two brothers saw on the way, of Tataka who harassed the families of hermits day and night, of her being struck by Rama's fatal arrow and starting on her journey to the land of Death, of Rama's lifting the bow of the king of Vidharbha, of his defeating the arrogant Parashurama by breaking the latter's bow.

12—17. Thus, dreaming of the great Valmiki's epic and later, thinking ceaselessly of Rama's great deeds, he would lie awake. On one occasion he saw in his dream Rama welcomed by maharshis and honoured on the way by old villagers. Some other time, he saw him with Sita and Lakshmana resting on the fine banks of the Godavari after their evening prayer. Another night he saw these two heroes and Maruti equipped with a monkey army, crossing the ocean to kill the wicked Ravana. Seeing in a dream once the extraordinary exploits of the two brothers, as though they were actually happening before him, the boy suddenly woke up, thrilled with ecstatic joy.

17, 18, 19. Thinking of Maruti's disinterested love for Rama and his brother and of his supreme happiness in his noble service to them, he silently wept in the night. His mind thus preoccupied with the wonderful epic, he had no thought of anything else and, inspired by Rama's amazing story, he longed to spread His glory on earth.

20—22. Three years thus elapsed and Narayana now hardly twelve, concentrating hard on Sri Rama, no longer cared for boyish games. Renudevi, perceiving his detachment, thought that marriage alone would make him happy. This decision made her doubly enthusiastic about her son's marriage.

23, 24, 25. So one day, sitting by his side and caressing his head tenderly, she said: "Will you, my son, do what I wish?" "Mother, I bow to your command. Say it without fear." Assured by his promise, she said, "I know you are against marriage, but just to please me, will you not remain with your bride while the wedding cloth is being held between you two?"

26, 27. He laid his head on his mother's feet and said that her command was law. The simple woman thinking that she had got his consent, was overjoyed, and finding an auspicious day for the wedding, set about making the necessary preparations.

28—33. At that time her elder brother Bhanaji Pant, living at Asan had a daughter five or six years old, daintier than a shireesha flower. After getting his approval to the union of the two families, Renudevi decided to have his lovely daughter as bride for her son. So, Narayana as a bridegroom set out with his people for Asan. On his arrival, Suryajipant who knew the rites, performed the betrothal ceremony. After sunset on an auspicious day of the bright half of Falgun, the bridegroom's procession with all the pomp of torches and sweet music, went along the street. Soon it reached the bride's house which was surrounded by canopies decked with fragrant flowers. After his feet were washed by women with pure water, Narayana moved on to the cloth pavilion, crowded with guests and relations, all eager to see the bridegroom.

34—37. Then, the bride and the bridegroom who were both yet minors sat on golden bridal seats and, as instructed by elders, performed puja prior to the marriage ceremony. Presently, the priests held a white cloth between them, and began to recite sacred mantras. Women showered them with rice. Just then, the bridegroom, unnoticed by anyone, slipped away and mingling in the crowd rushed out in the dark towards his village. Being an incarnation of the wind's son, he ran as swiftly as the wind itself, and later, finding a fig tree on the way, hid himself in its hollow.

38. Sheltered in the tree two or three days, the fugitive felt rested after the fatigue of the flight. Then, cautiously, he took the road to Panchavati before sunrise.

39, 40. Meanwhile, a tremendous uproar was created by his strange conduct. The frantic mother wept, her elder brother was distressed, "alack! alack!" exclaimed the disappointed guests, while the priests remained neutral.

41, 42. A few friends set out in search of the bridegroom. Relations formed two or three groups of boys and sent them out everywhere. Some of them went to the temple, others to the banks of the rivers, a few brave ones plunged into the forest.

43. No one guessed the road which the fugitive had planned to take beforehand. Who but the clever Hanuman knew that an ocean could be crossed without a boat ?
44. The bride's father, then, selected a boy from among those who had gathered and placing him opposite his daughter, performed the marriage ceremony.
- 45—48. When all efforts at tracing the fugitive had failed, the mother despairing of his return, became almost demented with grief. The elder son said to her as she was exhausted by sobbing, "Mother, did I not warn you before not to think of my brother's marriage ? But alas ! You ignored what I said and set about the matter in vain. Maybe, his disappearance was pre-ordained. Now do not grieve any more, for the merciful Rama is protecting him day and night. We shall certainly see him again soon." So saying, he took her back to their village.
49. Thus, the versatile boy, Narayana, who had obeyed his mother's command, spurned mundane pleasures, and turned to prayers. He considered the whole world as his own family. The great have always had a similar way of thinking in life.

CANTO V

1. As mentioned before, Narayana slipped out of the hollow of the tree, and trudging to Panchavati, reached the town completely exhausted.

- 2, 3. From here for a thousand miles the Godavari, an ornament to the Maharashtra, which has its source at the sacred place of Sri Tryambak, flows swiftly to join the sea. Long ago, Rama and Lakshmana were delighted to see its beautiful stream, and the latter built a fine cottage on a lovely spot on its bank.
- 4—6. Rama, with his wife and brother, always strolled happily on the banks of the river in flowery woods replete with fruit trees; Dnyaneshwara who lived in a village on the banks of the Godavari composed a jewel of a composition called Dnyaneshwari and dedicated it to Lord Krishna.
7. Arrived at its bank, Narayana, refreshed after a bath in its holy water, went to Rama's temple and prostrated himself before the image.
8. Near Panchavati there is a small hamlet called Takli, where the river Nandini joins the Godavari.
- 9—12. At the confluence of these two rivers on the way to Takli, Narayana accidentally discovered a cave where he made his abode gladly. He discarded his wedding garments and the armlet and ear-rings arranged on him by his mother, and donning a strip of loin cloth, bravely entered the life of an ascetic. He, who had been nurtured with love on wholesome food by his fond mother, and had slept on a bed, now lay on the floor with a stone for his pillow. The river served him with pure water, the wind with perfumed pollen of flowers, the trees with good shade, and the birds with their sweet warble.
- 13—17. In the dark forest cave whose interior was lighted by Rama's radiance, the boy resolved to practise penance for twelve years. At sunrise, awakened by the chirping of birds, he would rise as radiant as the morning sun and after toilet, go to the confluence of the two rivers. After ablutions in the limpid water and performance of sandhya, he stood on one leg, in waist-deep water until mid-day repeating with closed eyes, "Rama ! Rama !" and chanting Gayatri mantra a thousand times every day. At mid-day, he went to town for begging alms and, though never seen there before, was honoured by the housewives everywhere.

18—20. After offering a part of the alms to his God, he ate the rest. The young hermit followed all the regulations laid down by former maharshis. Wrapped in a piece of cloth, he possessed a natural lustre of nobility about his face. Women of the village vied with each other in serving him dainty food. Attracted by his peculiar radiance, milkmen gave him milk, young women flowers, old people their blessing.

21—23. In the afternoon, sipping the ambrosia of poetical works in the company of learned men and listening to their discourse, he sharpened his own intellect. Instructed by Vedic scholars, he learnt all the fourteen lores and by God's favour and his own industry mastered the Vedas also. Sometimes, at night, listening to the stories from the Bhagvata in Rama's temple, at other times to a delightful Harikirtan, he spent his time happily until midnight.

24—26. Three years thus elapsed. The boy continued his severe penance ; his body bleached from waist downwards, being bitten by fish. Finally, one day Rama revealed Himself before him in the cave and said, "I am pleased with thy devotion, O Ramadas !" So saying kindly, the Deity vanished. Thenceforth, people called him Ramadas. Later, on account of his extraordinary power, he was known as Samartha.

27—30. There lived then a certain wealthy but childless young man with his wife in a town called Dashapanchaka, two miles from Takli. He was worn out with consumption and though tended long by physicians, died. His virtuous wife bereft of everything by her husband's death, and wishing to mount his funeral pyre, accompanied the cortege to the ghat. The funeral procession, followed by the crying woman, whose forehead was besmeared with kumkum, going towards Nasik, finally reached the banks of the river.

31—33. Just at that moment was seen Ramdas meditating there peacefully after his daily practice of penance. Seeing his radiant face, the young woman wishing to get his approval approached him with folded hands before mounting her husband's funeral pyre. Hearing the tinkling of her bangles and seeing her kumkum-besmeared forehead, he blessed her, "May your husband live long and may you be the mother of eight sons."

34—39. "Will your blessing, O, Mahatma, be realised in this or in my next life?" She asked humbly with a wan smile before her relations. Surprised at her query, as the hermit glanced at her, he was informed of her husband's sad death and of her wish to follow him to the next world. He looked at the grief-stricken woman and felt greatly perplexed. Then, meditating intensely, he invoked his Deity mentally exclaiming, "O Raghupati, the blessing which suddenly slipped from my mouth cannot be fructified without Thy help. There cannot be a harvest without a torrent of rain. If my blessing always proves futile, how can I create confidence in people? There is nothing impossible on earth for Thee, Merciful Lord. Therefore, let Thy devotee's word come true." Thus praying to his God, he said to the relations of the dead, "Let the young lady's husband be brought here."

40—42. When the corpse was placed before him, the hermit stared at it a second, then, sprinkling the water of the Goda on it, said, "Arise, brother". Hardly had he addressed the dead man laid on the bier, when the latter, awakened from sleep as it were, sat up, repeating "Rama ! Rama !" The crowd of villagers gathered on the bank of the river to see the miracle were convinced of the hermit's extraordinary power.

43—44. The happy woman overwhelmed with gratitude fell at Samartha's feet and bathed them with tears. The sage said to her, "Lady, go home now happily with your husband. First I said, 'May you get eight sons.' Now I say, may you get ten."

45—46. After she and her husband had bathed in the river, she pressed Ramdas's feet and stood silent with folded hands. Then, the happy party after receiving his blessing, led the couple to their village, singing and dancing as though they were newly wedded.

47—48. The villagers that day marvelling, paid homage to Samartha, then praising him profusely, said with bowed heads, "O Mahatma, you are undoubtedly some god descended to earth. It was with an inscrutable purpose that the Creator created you from a portion of Himself."

49—50. The selfless Samartha hearing this eulogy of himself, replied humbly, "Being Brahmans you are powerful. The world follows your actions. O Aryas ! By the grace of the family Deity, there is nothing unattainable on earth. I am your servant." And he prostrated himself before them.

51. At sunset the villagers went home, singing loudly Samartha's praises and he, filling his bowl with pure water, returned to his cave.
- 52—54. Thenceforth, the grateful couple came every day all the way from Dashapanchaka to see the sage. After a year when the young man's wife gave birth to a son, she placed him at the maharshi's feet and prostrated herself on the ground before him. After blessing her, he said, "By Sri Rama's favour, this son is born to you. May he bring joy to those who deserve to be revered, as Nandi to Shiva."
- 55—58. "O Mahatma ! I dedicate my son to you gladly. Please accept him," she requested, delighted by his blessing.
- "What can a forester do with a babe ? He should be nurtured in his father's home. A lotus grows not in a mountain cave," replied Ramdas. But the couple, extremely anxious to dedicate their son to him, did not cease entreating. So finally Samartha consented and, taking the infant, gave him the name of Uddhava and instructed the mother to bring him at the time of his investiture of the sacred thread.
- 59—61. So when the child, reared with care and given his early instruction, was eight years old, he was brought by his parents to the sage on the banks of the river. Ramdas himself performed his adopted son's investiture and after initiating him, proudly took him to his cave at dusk. Later his mother had nine other sons and the family became known in the village as Dashaputre.
- 62—64. Thereafter Uddhava who, though yet a child, pious like Pralhada, lived happily in the cave near his Guru's feet. Listening daily to the latter's noble talk and witnessing his severe penance, what wonder that the lad became Samartha's best disciple? Thus, removed from the wings of his mother as a child like a young one of a cuckoo, Uddhava was purified by recitation of the Vedas, and disciplined with severe rules, he lived all his life with the sage.

CANTO VI

1—4. Historians have said that family Deities appear before Mahatmas either by day or night to talk to them. While he was staying at Panchavati, Raghupati appeared before Ramdas at dawn, with Maruti, more than once and commanded him, "O Muni! Thou hast stayed here long. Go now south and there elevate the minds of people with devotion for Vishnu." Hearing his Lord's mandate, Ramadas replied, "When my penance here terminates, I shall go to another town."

5—8. Towards the end of twelve years, Raghupati revealed himself again with Maruti as before, and said, "Eighteen years ago was born King Shivaji. Render him friendly help. A mighty army raised by the mlechchas to conquer the country, is burdening the earth. Let it be vanquished at once, and let the valiant King Shivaji destroy the enemy. May the light of the re-established Dharma blaze in the hearts of atheists. By the rays of your eloquence remove the darkness of their ignorance and liberate them from the gloom of adversity."

9—10. Ramdas replied with folded hands, "O Lord! My penance here will soon end, when I shall most humbly obey your behest." "Om," said Rama and vanished. And the muni continued his penance ceaselessly.

11—15. Later, the festival of Rama's birthday was celebrated by a daily Harikirtan in the courtyard of the temple for the delectation of villagers. The devout Ramdas wearing a piece of cloth, was seen by the villagers every day, listening to the epic eagerly like a bee sucking honey from a flower. One day Maruti appeared suddenly before him, saying, "I come today to hear Harikirtan from your mouth." "I have no ability to narrate the epic. I shall make blunders and be ridiculed," replied the hermit modestly. "Fear not, my dear friend. I am always by thy side to help thee in thy recitation," assured Maruti and the hermit consented.

16—21. Being permitted to conduct the Harikirtan, Ramdas began to recite it, when Hanuman in the guise of a boy sat by his side, and listened with great pleasure. While recounting Rama's story, Ramdas described Hanuman as he perched on a tree in Ravana's pleasure-garden to see the chaste Sita in her unhappy state. While he was describing this sad portion of the story, the boy by his side boldly asked, "Were the flowers on that tree red or white?" "Not red but white," replied the hermit. "Indeed, they were not white but were as red as the tawny rays of the rising sun," the boy argued.

22—25. The audience annoyed at the boy's quarrel with the narrator, were surprised at his presumption. Wishing to stop his prattle, they said, "Why do you want to display your eloquence? A discreet person never argues with a narrator but holds him in great respect. Therefore, enough of your useless battle of words, better listen to the story silently. If a person in a gathering becomes garrulous, the narrator has to retire out of helplessness. And don't you know, boy, that these stories have been recounted from very ancient times and an intelligent man listens to them silently with good faith?"

26—32. Ramdas stopped the audience from scolding the lad and said, "The flowers, my boy, were white, I repeat." Presently, he finished his beautiful narrative and as he returned to his cave, Maruti who had followed him, said, "My friend, listen. Formerly I saw in Ravana's garden a cluster of flowers on a karnikar tree. They were other than white, and yet why did you insist that they were white? I shall go again to Ravana's great city in my vimana, and if you come with me, you will see those flowers yourself." Ramdas replied, "Master! You have commanded me to narrate the epic, also to worship Raghupati. How then, can I go to Ravana's city without interrupting my work? If there is no breach of discipline, then I am at your service." "You are right. Continue your worship. I shall go there and bring some of those flowers myself." And Maruti vanished.

33—38. The celebration of Rama's birthday festival ended in due form and the twelve years of Ramdas's penance also were about to end. Rama appeared again before him along with Maruti and said, "Today the period of your long and severe penance will be over, my son. Now move on south and enlighten the minds of atheists." Ramdas Muni, with folded hands and bowed head, answered, "With Thy consent, O Lord, I, Thy servant, wish to wander on earth. After that I shall immediately obey Thy worshipful behest." Saying "Om", the Deity granted the Muni's wish and presenting him with a garment and a wreath of Tulsi flowers, vanished with Maruti.

39. Having received Rama's blessing and favour, the hermit prepared to go round the world. His young disciple Uddhava insisted on accompanying him, but Ramdas consoled him somehow and left the cave.

CANTO VII

1—8. Ramdas, after his ablutions in the waters of the river, performed Sandhya, then, singing the glory of God ardently, set out from the village on his peregrination. His fine stately body wrapped in saffron robe, and a catapult slung over his back, he went along distressed to see destruction in every town. Temple bells were no more heard ringing as before, nor musical instruments announcing the hour of puja. Devotees had disappeared from temples. Hermitages of rishis where the chanting of Vedas was once heard continuously, were now as silent and dismal as a funeral ground. After looting jewels and golden images from temples, the wicked yavanas either destroyed them or turned them into masjids. Young women of respectable families were carried away and forcibly married to mlechchas after their obstructing relations had been killed, and the streets were flooded with their blood. Arrogant yavanas burnt villages and wrought havoc everywhere. Agonised wails of dislodged women and children were heard continuously. When old villagers told Ramdas the story of the destruction, his mind was overcome with distress and he resolved to re-establish his Faith everywhere.

9—16. Finally, after wandering long, he reached Benaras. After a dip in the holy Ganga, he performed the evening puja, then, eager to see Rama's image, went to Shiva's temple where evening worship, accompanied by mridanga, bells and conches, was being conducted by Brahmans. As he was about to enter the temple he was stopped at the door by attendants who mistook him for a foreigner or a mlechcha priest because of his beard. So he went out and sat quietly under a tree. The linga of Shiva suddenly became invisible to the priests. Greatly upset by this strange phenomenon, the worshippers surmised that it was due to Divine displeasure at their having insulted a saintly person. So silently the Brahmans approached Ramdas with hands folded over their heads, exclaiming "Alas ! we have sinned against you, out of ignorance of your greatness. Please forgive us and come into Shiva's temple." No sooner had the hermit entered the temple than the shining linga became visible again.

17—23. At the well-known Hanuman Ghat, he installed Maruti's image and created a sense of devotion for him in the minds of the people. After remaining in the city some time, Samartha proceeded further until he reached the ancient city of Ayodhya, where he was thrilled to see the birth-place of Sri Rama, his ancestral Deity. As he walked in the streets, formerly sanctified by the dust of Rama's feet, he felt himself nearer to his God and considered himself blessed. Exalted by the frequent visitations of his Lord, Ramdas set out from the town to the holy places of Mathura, Prabhas, Brindarka, and Vrindavana. In each of these places, he prayed to its respective Deity and after establishing hermitages everywhere, appointed trustworthy disciples to look after them.

24, 25. At the advent of summer, he crossed the western ocean by a boat and reached Dwarka. Here he saw Lord Krishna's Image, performed His worship, and with a view to uplifting his followers installed Krishna's image everywhere.

26—28. After his pilgrimage to Dwarka, Ramdas wandered all over Kashmir and finally arrived at the beautiful town of Srinagar. Here, there was a Sikh yogi, a follower of Nanak, who, though in constant meditation of God, had not found spiritual peace. He had asked learned men who visited him to expound the abstruse principles of Vedanta, but had found no satisfaction from their explanation.

29, 30. When Samartha came there, he was invited by the Sikh yogi. Anxious to understand the essence of Vedanta, he received him with great reverence. Ramdas removed his doubts and, being completely satisfied, the latter found spiritual happiness as never before.

31—39. After visiting Kedar and Badri Narayana, and wandering in the most delightful Himalayan country, Ramadas reached an inaccessible peak which no human being had climbed before. Here he saw in a Himalayan grotto a snow image of Maruti and approaching it with intense love, sang the glory of Sri Rama's Messenger. Regardless of the extreme cold of the cave, he remained there, oblivious of food and drink. But somehow being provided with the necessities of life, he spent there four months. Then, taking leave of Maruti, he proceeded to Manasa lake, and visiting holy places on the way he went to Jagannath. He initiated those who came to him for guidance, and thus added to the number of his followers. Finally, he walked from North to South along the sea coast to Rameshwar. Here, he bowed to Maruti and after visiting the five holy places of Venkateshwara and others, arrived at Kishkindha. The pilgrim, then, went to Pampa lake and Rishyamukha mountain, and gathering numerous disciples, founded Rama's temple in each place. Then, walking a long distance and crossing the Sahyadri, Samartha finally returned to Panchavati alone after twelve years.

40, 41. After ablutions in the Goda while he was praying in Rama's temple, his Lord revealed Himself to Ramdas and said, "Proceed now to the banks of the Krishna and do thy duty." Samartha placed his head on the lotus-feet of his Lord, praying that he might be allowed to go to his birth-place first to see his mother. "Om", said Rama and vanished.

CANTO VIII

- 1—4. With Raghupati's approval, Ramdas left Panchavati and soon reached Paithan where he spent a few days. Meantime, his mother, not having seen him since his wedding day, had been mourning for him twenty-four years thus: "Leaving your mother, my darling, where on earth have you gone? Tell me, when shall I clasp you in my arms? Hoping you would return tomorrow or the day after, I have waited for you and bearing my grief, am clinging on to life."
- 5, 6. Thus lamenting, she passed a number of years expecting her son in vain and finally fell into a sea of grief out of despair. Shedding floods of tears day and night, the poor lady became blind and sinking with old age, was now ready for her journey to the next world.
- 7—10. Her elder son consoled his grieving mother by telling her that it was not right to mourn for what was inevitable. Did she not remember what Eknath muni had said, that his pious brother would one day achieve fame by his own brilliance, that he would save his country which was oppressed by cruel mlechchas and establish the Sanatan Dharma again? Trust in a saint's words dispelled adversity. Wherever his brother might be, he would be protected by Rama.
- 11—13. "Indeed, I have not forgotten the great Sage's words", she replied feebly, "but my mind is tormented by intense impatience to see my boy." "Mother, don't grieve, meditate on Rama. If you have faith you will soon get what you desire." His wise advice gave her courage and even peace of mind, and she remained absorbed in concentrating on Rama.

14—21. Meanwhile, Ramdas arriving at Paithan after his long pilgrimage held Harikirtans near Eknath's samadhi. His ardent recitation fascinated his audience, who wondered if Eknath muni himself stood before them in person. He was seen in the streets of Paithan dressed in saffron garments, wooden sandals on his feet, rosary in hand, a catapult slung over his back, girdle round his waist, thick matted hair on his head. Men, women, and children, intrigued by his strange attire, mocked at him. Once Ramdas muni went to the banks of the river where a large crowd of villagers had gathered for a bath. A curious Brahman asked him why he was carrying a catapult, what ashram he belonged to. Was it Brahmacharya or the final stage that he had embraced? "I don't belong to any ashram, but out of the two, I have taken to Brahmacharya," replied Samartha.

22—24. "Then, why do you carry this catapult?" "Having been a servant of Rama since childhood, I have resorted to a life of freedom." "Is it for sport or for hurting others, that you carry it?" "As a means of meditation; a person like me does not indulge in sport," rejoined Ramdas. "Then use your catapult to kill that kite flying in the air," bantered another fault-finder giggling churlishly.

25—28. Samartha, thus urged by the mischievous man, aimed at the bird, which, being hit in its chest, reeled in the air and crashed on the ground motionless. At the sight of the lifeless bird, old people, young men, women and children, surrounding the hermit, created a terrific row. An impertinent youth exclaimed mockingly, "You charlatan! After embracing Brahmacharya, you destroy a bird like a hawk. What good is this guise of a saffron robe or matted hair, or rosary if you commit a wicked deed contrary to moral principles?"

29, 30. "I merely obeyed you," replied Samartha. "Though educated you are devoid of discretion. Simply because people out of fun asked you to use your catapult, you have actually killed the bird! Now atone for your sin", shouted the crowd.

31—33. As the Brahmans raised a tremendous uproar, the peaceful Samartha said, "Very well, I agree. Tell me the rite prescribed by the S'astras to wipe out my sin." And they ordered him to have his head shaved. So he had his beard and head shaved; bathed in the river, wore a fresh sacred thread and drank *Panchagavyam given him by a priest.

34—36. Then, humbly he asked the Brahmans if he was purified. "You are now free from sin. Why talk about purification?" they retorted. "Revered Brahmans! If what you say is true, then, how is it, that in spite of atonement of my sin the bird is not resuscitated?" he asked. "Oh! you dullard! Don't you know that the dead do not come back to life? But Prayaschit is the only means of atoning for a sin," declared the crowd.

37. "The S'astras only recommended atonement. Why do they not show how a dead creature is to revive?"

38, 39. So saying he addressed the bird cheerfully, "Fly, my pretty bird, as before." Hardly had he uttered

* A mixture of five products of the cow's body : milk, curds, ghee, urine and dung, this when the kite flapping her soft wings flew towards the sky and with a warble, swiftly whirled away at her sweet will.

- 40, 41. The amazed crowd, with their faces raised and eyes fixed on the flying kite, stood rooted to the ground as it were. Presently, as they turned their gaze away and saw the sage with a beard and matted hair just as before, they stood staring at him with eyes wide open with awe and astonishment.
42. With folded hands, they begged his forgiveness for having sinned against him, out of ignorance of his great power.
- 43, 44. Ramdas bowed most humbly and said, "It is by Rama's power, not mine, that this bird has been resurrected, O Brahmans. He is the Creator and King of the Earth. He is all-powerful, and there is nothing inaccessible to Him." Uttering this, he flung the catapult on the ground and returned to his abode.

CANTO IX

- 1, 2. After the kite's miraculous resurrection, Ramdas was looked up to by the villagers as an embodiment of God. Hundreds of persons, thirsty to sip the elixir of his Harikirtan, gathered to hear the beautiful stream of words flowing from his mouth.
- 3—8. Once a Brahman came from the village of Ambad to hear the Harikirtan near Eknath's Samadhi. He recognised Ramdas, and approaching him at the end of the kirtan, said, "I think you are S'restha's younger brother?" "Quite so", replied Ramdas and the Brahman continued, "You are entertaining people here with Harikirtans, but your mother is most anxious to see you again. The poor lady has become blind by crying ceaselessly. Therefore, bring her joy by letting her see you again." "I shall go at once to see my mother," Ramdas promised. He soon went to the village of Jambh without fatigue, and proclaiming Rama's name loudly entered the courtyard of his father's house.

9, 10, 11. Hearing this, his mother said to her daughter-in-law, "There is an ascetic outside, serve him." And the young woman went out, with a plate of food in her hand. The sage who had by now mounted the steps of the vestibule, told her that he was not a mendicant. Hearing his voice, the mother stammered from inside, "Is that my Naru?" "Yes," he replied and entered the house instantly.

12—15. He fell on the ground and laid his head on her feet while the daughter-in-law stood amazed. The happy mother's joy at the reunion with her son after twenty-four years, was reminiscent of that of the mothers of Rama and Lakshmana. The poor woman oozing with love, caressed his matted hair, his face and arms again and again, saying, "Alas ! I, who had seen your boyish face framed in flying curls, cannot see it now in the prime of your youth."

16, 17, 18. Moved by her pitiful words, he said, "Mother, if you wish to see me, why do your eyes delay?" And he touched her eyes tenderly two or three times when, suddenly, regaining her sight and radiant with ecstatic joy, she clasped him with both arms.

19, 20. Amazed to see his majestic appearance, she said that he had certainly learnt to do ghostly tricks after his long wandering. Samartha gave her the right reply, "I shall describe the wonderful ghost from whom I learnt the tricks. Listen, mother !

21—31. “He who once belonged to *Vaikuntha descended to Ayodhya to suckle his mother Kausalya’s breast. Mother, that is the ghost I speak of. While going to Vishvamitra’s hermitage, he killed on the way the dreadful demoness Tataka. Mother! That is the ghost I speak of. While passing by the forest path, his lotus-like foot touched a stone and turned it into a pure woman. † Mother! That is the ghost I speak of. Thence he went to King Janaka’s city, lifted Shiva’s bow and married Seeta. Mother! That is the ghost I speak of. The terrified Bhargava gave him his own bow which he snapped easily. Mother! that is the ghost I speak of. In order that his father’s promise to Kaikayi might not be broken, he became a forester. Mother! That is the ghost I speak of. Wandering fourteen years, this ascetic, always accompanied by Lakshmana, lived in the forest. Mother! That is the ghost I speak of. He protected Sugriva, destroyed Vali and crossed the ocean by a bridge. Mother! That is the ghost I speak of. After killing Ravana and his clan, he saved Bibheeshana and released gods from prison. Mother! That is the ghost I speak of. Finally, taking his wife, he went to the banks of the Sarayu where he met Bharat. Mother! That is the ghost I speak of. Ramdas worships Rama Raja who is known to be the soul of all beings. Mother! That is the ghost I speak of.”

32. Hearing her son’s lofty and fluent speech composed in beautiful verse, her eyes full of tears, she pressed him to her bosom.

33, 34. Meantime, the elder brother was surprised to hear his voice. And his heart stirred with emotion, he received him with great affection. Ramdas laid his head on his elder brother's feet ; the latter lifted him at once and, bathing him with tears, kissed his head and embraced him.

* Vishnu’s abode.

† Ahilva cursed by her husband Gautama, remained a stone until touched by Rama’s feet.

35, 36, 37. After dinner, urged by his three relations, he recounted his history of twenty-four years. Hearing it, his mother said with a sob, "You have raised your family and achieved immortal glory. By your intense faith in Rama, you have shown to the world the path of worship. Felicitating you would be redundant, my son. Now sanctify the home by staying on here."

38, 39, 40. Thus extolled tenderly by his mother and conversing with his brother all day long, he passed a month happily. The spiritual talks carried on in elegant verse between the brothers, day and night, thrilled the mother. Later, when Ramdas wished to leave the house, she, anxious to prevent him from going said, "Don't leave me, darling," and embraced him fondly.

41, 42. Ramdas said, "Mother, do not grieve in vain. Whence can a mortal find eternal happiness ? How can a man sunk in a sea come out dry ? Man experiences happiness in life as much as the reverse.

43, 44. "Happy is he who gladly accepts what is ordained by God. Unhappy is he who craves to get happiness at his own sweet will. Therefore, mother, leave everything at Raghupati's feet, for you will certainly get what you desire. I shall now tell you a story. Listen, mother."

45—48. So saying, in pleasing words, the sage told her the beautiful tale of Kapilagita which maharshi Kapila had once narrated to his mother. Renudevi with tears streaming from her eyes and her whole being thrilled, said that formerly Raghupati had promised to reveal His form to her. If she could only see Him, she would get supreme happiness on earth and feel blessed.

- 49, 50. Hearing his mother's words, while Ramdas was lost in meditation, Sri Rama, Lakshman, Maruti and Seeta revealed themselves before them both. Samartha, seeing his mother comforted and intensely happy after the divine visitation, promised to come back to her again, the moment she remembered him. And he left his paternal home.

CANTO X

- 1, 2, 3. The revered sage, after taking leave of his people, reached the banks of the Godavari, otherwise called Ganga by the villagers. He walked round the river, then, went to his cave. The following morning he moved from Takli to Panchavati, when his Lord revealed Himself before him, saying, "O Ramdas! Go now to the banks of the Krishna and show the world the path of worship. Be the worthy Guru of the benevolent Shivaji who has descended on earth for the glory of the righteous Swarajya."
- 4, 5. Obeying the Lord's behest humbly, he went to Takli immediately and informed his disciple Uddhava that the Lord had commanded him to reside on the banks of the Krishna for the welfare of the people. Hearing this, the loyal youth Uddhava was very much distressed and dreading separation from his Guru again, pressed his feet and stammered:
- 6, 7, 8. "From my birth until I was eight, my parents reared me with love, but arya! you, who adopted me, are my real father. My revered parents merely brought me into the world. Looking forward to a happy reunion, I bore the pangs of separation from you while you went on a long pilgrimage. How can I again bear parting from you who are my mother, father, Guru and friend? I have lived here twelve years, meditated and prayed under your guidance. I did not stir from here nor did I go to my father's house but remained here happily, out of reverence for you, O Master."

9, 10. Moved by his touching words, the sage embraced him and wiping his tear-stained face, said to the youth tenderly, "Formerly, I set out on a pilgrimage to the Himalaya where it was not right to take a child. Now I go to the banks of the Krishna round about Mahableshwar where you will come soon."

11, 12. Thus consoling him cheerily Samarthā went after three days to the Krishna river and reaching Mahableshwar, started his fourth penance—the spiritual uplift of the people. In that beautiful mountainous country which was then a wilderness, fragrant with the perfume of flowers, he soon settled down in a lonely cave in compliance with his Lord's command.

13, 14. He commenced performing Harikirtan. His stately form emitting radiance from a long penance, his pleasing recitation full of sweet, frank flow, soon drew hundreds of listeners. Learned men came, being delighted by his pure elegant style, students to understand the essence of the Vedānta, out of admiration for his fervour, while the simple folk feeling overjoyed by the narration.

15. His audience, their hearts full of devotion, exclaimed, "Oh! what a fervour this great sage has! May he be our revered Guru."

16. Thus, Ramdas muni, his great virtues being proclaimed by all good people in Mahableshwar, was surrounded from morning till night by thousands of humble devotees.
17. He soon became famous in the country round the Krishna, where, by narrating the story of the Ramayana to villagers, he brought them comfort.
- 18—20. Later, he set out towards Wai, near Mahableshwar, where meditating and expounding Rama's heroic life story to the people, he lived in seclusion. As he was about to leave Wai, someone suggested an ideal spot for meditation on a hill called Jaranda near Satara for his sojourn. Mahuli was not far from here, so this delightful place pleased him. Here the Krishna and the Veni meet and heighten Nature's beauty.
- 21, 22 Ramdas lived in a lonely but a delightful spot in the Sahyadri mountains. After bathing early in the morning in the confluence of the two rivers, he ate what he received as alms and played like a child with children on the banks of the Veni. Although he lived alone in an obscure mountain cave, his fame spread everywhere. No matter where a deer may remain, the perfume of its musk spreads in all directions.
- 23, 24, 25. At that epoch lived other sages in the Maharashtra sanctifying it by the glory of their penance, such as Ananda Muni, Jayaram Swami, Morya, Tukaram and others. Tukaram once went trudging from Dehu to see Ramdas and oblivious of the external world sang on the way the glory of Panduranga. Who could describe the joy of the two maharshis when they met each other? Their meeting was indeed like that of Shuka and Vamadeo.
26. Later, they often met and gradually, their mutual reverence produced a bond of brotherly affection between them.

27, 28. One day Samartha asked Tukaram how he had attained the state of renunciation and also gained Pandurang's favour. So in answer, Tukaram recounted his life's story in beautiful verse as follows :

29—32. "Though born of the lowest caste, I have been a fervent devotee of my family Deity. I lost everything in trade. By the loss of my parents and brother, I suffered a heap of sorrow. During the famine my wife died tortured by hunger. I was ashamed and afraid of a painful existence and distressed by complete ruin. In place of the demolished temple at Dehu, I built another. I learnt by heart some devotional verses composed by great sages. Always devoted to the cause of service of man my tired body was emaciated. I studied the poetical works of great men and started performing Harikirtan.

33, 34. "My mind was never trained but I was not ashamed, for a flame of poetic imagination had suddenly manifested itself in me though uneducated. Later, on account of my low caste, I was forbidden to perform Harikirtan by Brahmans and, as ordered by them, I threw my compositions into the river.

35. "Then as I sat depressed by the river, Hari, in a heavenly voice comforted me. And Panduranga alone knows what my future state will be."

36, 37. After finishing his narrative, Tukaram said, "Tell me, now, my friend, the story of your life." And Samartha recounted it in verse. The noble Tukaram, who was moved to tears, felicitated him and returned to Dehu.

38—41. In course of time, two or three women leaving their homes and relations, became Samartha's followers and always remained near him. There was a lady called Sati living at Shahapur, whose house the sage, though unknown to her, used to visit for alms. One day when her husband was in great distress, having been seized by Muslims unjustly, Samartha saved him from their clutches as Shibi had rescued a dove from a hawk. Since then, his whole family, particularly his pious wife, felt greatly indebted to Samartha.

42—43. Later, Samartha, after testing Sati, was convinced of her constancy as Sri Rama was with the devotion of a jungle woman. He dissuaded Sati from following him, and installing Maruti's image in a hut near her house enjoined her to worship it.

44—46. His other two women followers were Akka and Venu, clever and virtuous. The latter was a widow and served him in his ashram; the former left her guardian with her sons, and attended on the sage who loved her elder son Ambaji. Day by day, as Ramdas's disciples increased in number, he left some of them in charge of hermitages founded in various places.

47—50. Ramdas chose Masur for celebrating Rama's birthday. The place being inhabited mostly by Brahmans, was known as Brahmanpur. Near the temple selected for the festival, was a mango tree. Wishing to remove its branches that might cause obstruction, the sage asked his disciple to climb the tree and cut some of them. As young Ambaji was cutting the branches, he slipped and fell headlong into a well near by.

51—53. None of the other disciples who saw this, ventured to inform Samartha, then meditating inside the temple, and Ambaji remained long in the well. Finally, his terrified mother dreading a tragedy, tremulously informed the sage, who said, "Akka, fear not. Your son is unhurt." And, he rushed to the well, and inquired from above, "Are you all right in the water, my boy? Tell me." "By your favour, master, I am safe and happy."

54. Hearing Ambaji's voice from the depths of the well, his Guru asked him to come out and the humble youth obeyed his command promptly.
- 55, 56. As he saw Ambaji coming out of the well drenched, the sage said, "Henceforth, you will be known as Kalyan, the happy one." Later, being constantly together, the guru and his disciple were associated by people as Vyasa and Shuka.
- 57, 58. Ramdas very much wanted to install Rama's image in the temple on the day of the Birth Festival. He searched for one far and wide, and his efforts were at last successful. After bathing in the Krishna one day, as he sat meditating on the sands, he heard a voice, saying, "In this very spot, son, you will find an image of your Lord."
59. Delighted to hear the voice issuing from the river, he plunged into the water and diving deep, found a couple of stone images. Then, singing the glory of Raghupati, he returned to the bank.
- 60, 61. One of these was a beautiful image of Rama with Sita and Maruti and the other a heavy idol of Shiva and Parvati, the latter in the act of killing the demon Mahisha. Samartha placed both images on the bank and with a glad heart worshipped them. Then, meditating long, he composed an elegant verse in Sanskrit.

62, 63. A cowherd, who watched this incident, informed the head of the village. The latter, accompanied by a hundred villagers, immediately arrived there and seeing Samartha on his way with the idols, shouted, "Hey, hey, where are you carrying this property which belongs to others? Leave them both at once and go your way." "I found them in the river and not in the town," replied the sage, and leaving them, went away.

64—66. The villagers tried to lift the idols proudly to carry them to the village, but soon found it was impossible to move them. The head of the village remarked to his astonished companions, "It is strange indeed that the hermit single-handed could lift these idols so easily, when a hundred of us could not even move them. He must be some great man." So saying, he overtook Samartha at the village of Chaffal and said, "Please, forgive our error. Let these images which you have found in the river, be installed in a temple here."

67, 68. "Om", said the delighted Ramdas, and sent his disciples to the river. When they had brought the idols to Chaffal, he got a few Brahmans to install them in a temple with dignity. And later, Sri Rama's birthday festival was celebrated to everyone's delight.

CANTO XI

1, 2. Swarajya is indispensable for the stability of a country's religion, which alone leads to happiness both in this and the next world. Just as Ramdas lighted the path of righteousness by his own radiance, so did the brave Shivaji illuminate the Maharashtra by the torch of Swarajya.

- 3—9. While the sage was practising penance at Panchavati, Shivaji routed the hateful foreign enemy and won many towns. The triumphant hero, who was neither too soft nor too severe, had settled in the fort of Rajgad. He had already heard of Samartha's fame, and having a great regard for sages, once went to Mahad where lived a votary of Vishnu. While telling the story of the great devotee Dhruva, he said that it was impossible for one to attain salvation without a Guru. Hearing this, Shivaji said to himself, "Alas, I have not yet found one ! I must really choose one of the maharshis here, as my Guru." With this decision, being eager to attain spiritual happiness, he set out for Pratapgad to consult his family Deity. He worshipped Goddess Bhavani and anxious to hear the oracle, slept all night in front of her image.
10. The Goddess dressed as a married woman, appeared in his dream, saying, "May Ramdas muni, the incarnation of Maruti, be your Guru."
11. Waking in a transport of joy, he went to Mahableshwar, where he received a letter from the sage written in verse.
- 12—14. Shivaji moved by affectionate reverence as he read Samartha's friendly letter said to himself with a choked throat, "Fie upon me that I have not yet seen the great sage who is equal to a Siddha." Thus thinking himself utterly unworthy, and full of distress and remorse, he sent a humble and regretful reply :
- 15, 16. "O Mahatma, out of ignorance and not out of ill-will have I committed a sin of omission. Forgive me and grant me an interview, for I long to see you." He gave the letter to the maharshi's messenger and accompanied by his intimate friends, went to Chaffal.

- 17, 18. Not finding the sage there, Shivaji left his companions, and directed by Samartha's disciples, went himself to Shingan and saw the sage from a distance seated under an udumbar tree, absorbed in composing his work of Dasabodha.
- 19, 20. The disciple returning with the king's letter at the same time, announced, "Master, King Shivaji has come to see you." And as soon as the visitor approached the sage, the latter asked smiling, "Why this hurry of coming, O King? We are all being well looked after in your kingdom."
- 21, 22. The King replied humbly, "O Mahatma! Forgive me for my error and grant me a favour." The sage was pleased and uttered "Om", and the King performed his puja. Great sages, however, do not seek adulation or honour.
- 23, 24. The priceless jewellery which Shivaji placed before the maharshi, was thrown away by the latter. He asked passing cowherds to collect it, which the delighted boys did promptly. They say that even now one finds occasionally a pearl or a jewel in this spot.
25. Then as Samartha chanted thirteen mantras, the King prostrated himself at his feet in ecstasy.
- 26, 27, 28, 29. "Tell me your inner thoughts, O Guru," requested the King, and the sage expounded them in five brief sweet verses. This pithy nectar-like exposition touching the very core of his heart, Shivaji was lost in samadhi for a moment. Samartha, pleased with his power of concentration, caressed his head and raised him, then, said in a deep voice, "O King, what you have just experienced is the highest bliss." And the King replied, "O Mahatma, I who was without a Guru am now blessed with one."

30. Later, Samartha gave him a handful of earth, a few pebbles, a bilba fruit and two lumps of horse's dung.
- 31—34. Shivaji accepted the gifts, went round him several times, prostrated himself before him, and with folded hands said, "O Mahatma, it is only today that I know what supreme happiness is and I wish to preserve it. What is the use of fighting for kingdoms or struggling for victory? What good is power? What good is the acquisition of a hundred kingdoms before this peaceful bliss? Freed from all worries, I wish to remain near you and serve at your feet. Therefore, grant me this favour."
- 35—37. Samartha smiling asked, "Is that why you have come to me for guidance? The Creator has quite a different purpose in creating you. Having accepted the duties of a King, you must guard Swarajya. Know ye, O King, that it is the duty of a Kshatriya to protect Brahmans and to worship God. You are destined for extraordinary deeds of valour, and your first duty is to release your country from the yoke of the mlechchas."
38. "Master, I bow to your command humbly. I shall be blessed if you tell me the duties of a Kshatriya," said Shivaji.
- 39, 40. The sage felicitated him, saying, "Praiseworthy is your desire. I shall tell you the duties of a Kshatriya as explained to me long ago. Listen! A Kshatriya should deal with wordly affairs himself. He should appoint trustworthy and resourceful men, and throw out cruel enemies. He should satisfy equally the rich and the poor in difficulty, and speak with calmness, fortitude and discretion. While ruling the kingdom of Maharashtra, O King! worship God with fervour, protect poor Brahmans, and honour your realm."

- 41—42. After he had thus advised the King, Samartha before leaving said to his disciples, "Let Rama's favour be bestowed on the King and entertain him till I come back from the mountain." Instructing them thus, he hurried towards the Thoda hill.
- 43—45. The disciples escorted the King to the temple at Chaffal immediately. After the latter had prostrated himself before Rama's image, they begged of the Lord to confer favour on him. Just then, a bouquet of flowers dropped down from the head of the image. A disciple picked it up, and no sooner had he placed it on the King's crown, than the beautiful bouquet turned into a bunch of pearls. "This is indeed an inscrutable act of God," cried the amazed people around.
46. Later, Shivaji, as desired by the sage, spent the whole day in the village. The following morning the latter returned and honoured him with hospitality.
- 47, 48. As he was about to set out for his capital, the King remarked, "Having now heard by your kindness the duties of a Kshatriya, I should love to see you every day." Ramdas answered, "How can there be a constant contact between a king and a forester? A fish seeketh not the companionship of a bird."
- 49—51. Shivaji accepted his word humbly, and sad to leave the sage, bid him farewell and proceeded to Pratapgad. He told the story of the sage to his revered mother, as also of his extraordinary miracles. Neither the bilba fruit nor the bunch of pearls astonished her as the clods of earth and horse's dung, conferred on him as gifts by the sage.
- 52, 53. "Why did the sage give you these strange things, my son?" she asked, and the King explained to her, "Mother, the lumps of earth mean he wishes me to possess a vast kingdom, pebbles innumerable forts, and horse's dung excellent stables."

54. Profoundly amazed to hear the deep meaning of the sage's gifts, the queen-mother remarked, "Indeed, it is your great fortune, my son, that such a great maharshi accepted you as his disciple."

CANTO XII

- i, 2, 3. After receiving his favour, Shivaji visited the sage often, and discussed state affairs with him. In course of time, the country was suddenly invaded by the enemy, and anxious to get his Guru's advice, the King remained awaiting him. Meantime, he sent out messages in search of Ramdas who, however, could not be found anywhere.
- 4—7. At this stage his ministers said, "Your Majesty, the enemy must be routed. Let a council meeting be called at once. Delay ends in disaster." And the King rejoined, "Nothing will be done without Samartha's advice." The ministers were frantic with anxiety at his persistence. After surrounding the country, the enemy was about to attack it, when Samartha, sandals on his feet and rosary in his hand, suddenly appeared, as formerly Vyas muni before Yudhishthira.
8. After the King and his ministers had prostrated before him, Samartha said to Shivaji, "With clever ministers around you, why do you depend on a forester?"
10. Shivaji, with folded hands replied, "I shall not take a step without consulting you, O Mahatma. What good are ministers or a mighty army without my Guru's counsel in time of difficulty? Without the reflected rays of the sun, the moon cannot dispel the darkness of the night."

11, 12. Hearing this, Samartha said, "Blessed are you for your devotion to me; though outwardly far, I am ever near you in an invisible form. Whenever in difficulty, O King, pray to your family Deity with a steady mind. Seek Her command and follow it. Her mandate will be to your good.

13—16. "Now hear what you should do. After cleansing yourself, choose a skilful scribe from amongst your trusted friends and a smart questioner. When you three meet, the questioner may ask the Goddess what should be done, and She will answer through your mouth. Whatever is uttered by you, the scribe should write it down clearly, word by word, which should be obeyed as a behest of the Goddess. When you honour Her command your distress caused by the enemy will be warded off and by the favour of the Benign Goddess, you will be crowned with victory."

17, 18. Thus advising, Ramdas suddenly vanished. The King obeyed his command, and went forth to confront the enemy, and returned to Poona victorious. Later, whenever overcome with difficulty, he propitiated his Goddess and obeyed Her behest issuing from his own mouth.

19. Thus, Shivaji routed the enemy delivered the kingdom overrun by the Mlechhas, and established Swarajya in the Maharashtra, striking terror into the heart of his enemy.

20—24. Once, the King wishing to see the sage staying in the valley of Chaffal approached him with folded hands, and stood before him humbly. When Shivaji was seated, the latter noticing his tired face, asked if he was thirsty. "Yes, I am," said Shivaji. Thereupon, the sage moved towards a slab of stone near by, lifted it, and there appeared a mountain-stream of crystal water. "Drink this excellent water," said Ramdas and the King drank it to his fill, then, bowing gratefully, spent the day with the sage. This streamlet created by Samarthā in his mountain cave for Shivaji, is still seen by travellers and is known as Kubdi Tirtha.

25—31. On another occasion, Shivaji, marching with two thousand soldiers, reached the hill of Chaffal, when he heard that the sage was somewhere near by. So to avail himself of the pleasure of seeing his Guru, he set out with a couple of his followers to Ramdas's cave. After welcoming him, the sage asked him to have his midday meal with him. The visitor, seeing but one disciple there, said humbly that he had left two thousand men at the foot of the hill. How could so many be fed in a forest when there was only one disciple there? The sage smiled and replied, "You know that by the mercy of God, millions of creatures live in this forest. So don't worry." And he ordered his disciple to feed the King's soldiers as soon as they had washed themselves. As the disciple looked worried, he continued, "Go to yonder hill, lift up the slab at the entrance of the cave and instantly you will find all that is needed."

32—34. The disciple obeying his Guru's command, saw a vast, well-swept table-land polished with cow-dung and with beautiful trees planted on either side. In that enormous place were arranged attractive seats to accommodate more than two thousand men, and large gold vessels full of four kinds of warm dainty food, worthy of the King, his ministers and his army.

- 35, 36. Seeing this wonderful scene, the disciple with his eyes bulging out, stood rooted to the ground for a moment, then, quickly returned to his Guru. The latter ordered him to take the soldiers there and led the King and his followers himself to the vast plateau inside the cave.
37. The grateful King saw the delightful spot, and surmising that it was created by the maharshi's power for entertaining him, was moved to tears of gratitude with which he bathed his Guru's feet.
- 38—40. Extremely anxious to have Samarthā always near him, Shivaji begged him repeatedly to comply with his request. Finally, Ramdas consented and stayed in a fort at Parali with his disciples, and installed Rama's image in its southern quarter. In this fort the sage lived with good people, hence it was named Sajjangad.
- 41—44. While Saman Fort was being constructed in the province of Hukeri, King Shivaji out of curiosity went one day before sunrise to inspect it. Seeing thousands of workmen there, he said to himself somewhat proudly, "Blessed indeed am I that more than a thousand poor men are being fed by me." While he was thus boasting mentally, Samarthā suddenly appeared. Shivaji bowed to him, and asked whence he had come there all of a sudden. And the maharshi replied that he had come to see the good work Shivaji had begun there.
- 45, 46. Greatly touched, Shivaji said, "It is our good fortune and of the place that we are sanctified by the dust of your feet." "Lakshmi will always smile over this place where Maruti lives. You are rightly called King for delighting your subjects." So saying, the sage strolled with the King.

- 47, 48. In the middle of the well-swept road, he saw a huge slab of stone and asked why the workmen had left it there after clearing the street. So by the King's command, an artisan began to cut it until he had reduced it to a round shape, when he was stopped by the sage from further operation.
- 49, 50. Between the two sections of this cocoanut-shaped stone filled with half a jar of water, lay a frog snug and quiet. The sage said to the astounded Shivaji, "Blessed are you, O King, that not only a thousand workmen but even a frog is sheltered by you."
- 51—53. Hearing these acute words of the sage, the King felt abashed, and touching his feet begged his pardon for the wrong he had committed mentally. Samartha caressed his head and smiling, said, "You are a favourite devotee of God, Who has made you the protector of the people. In order to purify your mind by wiping out the proud thought that entered it, I came here today."
- 54, 55. Once while going from Chaffal to another village with his disciples, Samartha reached at midday a hamlet called Padali on the way. When his disciples went to town with their wallets for alms the sage rested on the bank of the river after his prayers.
- 56, 57. At the sight of the half-naked disciples, the chief of the village shouted angrily, "Why are you begging, you shameless men? What religion is this you follow?" And he snatched their wallets and bowls, then slashing them again with harsh words, drove them away.
58. When the sage heard this, he said that it was kind of the village chief to let them off. And he moved on with his disciples.

59—62. Just then, the whole village being set on fire, was suddenly shrouded in smoke. The terrified villagers dashed here and there frantically. A furious giant monkey holding a firebrand, was seen jumping from one house to another, and setting them on fire rapidly. The villagers reproaching their chief, shouted at him fiercely, "By your wicked behaviour to the disciples of a maharshi has this disaster been brought on us. Fie on you!" Reproaching him thus, men, women and children went in quest of the sage, whom they found in a mango-grove with his disciples, not far from the village. They all prostrated themselves before him and with bowed heads and begged his pardon.

63, 64. "Don't be scared. Look in front of you!" he said and the villagers saw the monkey extinguishing the blaze with a shower of water. Seeing the miracle resulting from the incredible powers of the sage, they stood spell-bound as though they had lost their speech.

65. Later, Ramdas delighted to see the village as intact as before, said to the villagers, "My gentle friends, may there never be another fire here again," and his words uttered then have proved true to this day.

66, 67. Once, the sage ordered his disciples to lock his room from outside and instructed them not to open it for sixteen days as he wished to meditate for mental peace. He remained inside meditating some time and became aware of his mother's condition, then at night when all the disciples were asleep, he started for Jambh to see his mother.

68, 69. Meanwhile, his mother who was about to die, had been calling him every moment. As her elder son was consoling her, Samartha arrived. As soon as he said to her, "Mother, here I am ; look at your Naru," she was revived and stared at him silently.

70, 71. Samartha then said to her tenderly, "The moment you remembered me, I came from far to tend you." "Blessed am I to have given birth to two jewels of sons," she murmured. "You are not only our mother, but the mother of the world," Samartha said softly, laying his head on her feet.

72 Then, the emaciated woman who could hardly move in bed, folded her hands, concentrated deeply on Rama, and as though anxious to join her husband, closed her eyes.

73, 74. Once after an inspection, Shivaji returned from Raigad to his palace in Satara where he remained for a while. After a dip in the river at Mahuli and his evening prayers, Samartha wandered in another town for alms, then, came to Satara.

75, 76. As the King was resting comfortably, Ramdas proclaimed Sri Rama's name aloud. Hearing his voice, Shivaji was thrilled to know of his Guru's arrival and said to himself, "Nothing less than my kingdom should be presented to the revered one who is asking for alms," and with this resolve, he handed the sage a document stamped with his own name, transferring his kingdom to the suppliant.

77—79. The sage read the document, dropped it into his begging bowl and said humorously to the King, "After giving me your kingdom, what will you do without an occupation ?" "I wish to serve you always, Mahatma," replied the King. The sage agreed, and followed by the King and his disciples carrying their wallets, moved on. After offering a part of the alms to his Lord, and sharing the rest with the King and his disciples, the sage said to the former, "Now you know, my son, what happiness you would enjoy living with me."

80. "There is no happiness for me other than being in your company," replied the King. Pleased with this reply, the sage asked him again, "Will you agree to what I wish?" "I have consecrated myself to you," answered the King humbly.
81. "If that is your firm resolution, then, bear the burden of your kingdom yourself in the right way. The King when he rules, serves also Brahmans like me practising penance.
- 82—84. "When Rama wished to be free from the world and hand over his kingdom to his Guru Vasishtha, listen what the latter advised him: 'A Brahman may practise penance always, the King should rule his subjects righteously, for by protecting Brahmans, he serves his Guru. I, a forester and an ascetic, have no desire for royal pleasures. Therefore, O King, rule and protect your subjects as your own children. And Rama thus guided obeyed his Guru.'
85. As he heard Samartha's stimulating speech, Shivaji bending his head, accepted his advice gladly and following the noble example of Raghupati, embraced the Goddess of royalty again.

CANTO XIII

- 1, 2. The Mohomedan emperor shook with fear as the valiant Shivaji continuously won countless towns and forts. Amongst the high officials living in Bijapur, was one Afzal Khan by name who harassed non-Muslim subjects intensely.

3. He once gathered a tremendous army and intent on subjugating Shivaji's territory, prepared himself to invade it.
- 4—6. Shivaji went to his Guru to get his blessing, when the latter advised him to pray to God with a steadfast mind, so that he would be the conqueror. Following his advice, the King ere long held the banner of victory after tearing the mlechha chief with claws, as did Narasimha, his enemy. He buried the enemy on the battle-field and secured immense wealth, steeds and elephants. By removing the thorn from the path of righteousness, he pleased good people.
- 7—10. Freed from the ghastly horror of an invasion, the victor, thanking Merciful God, went eagerly to see his Guru who was then absorbed in the composition of Dasabodha in a mountain cave. Prostrating himself before the sage, the King stood humbly with folded hands. The Guru asked him to read a passage from his book, describing the qualities of the worthiest man. Shivaji, after reading it, said somewhat moved, "Master, you are powerful enough to turn a poor man into Kuber (the God of wealth), and a sinner into a Godly man. That is why you are known as Samarthā. The appellation of Das is only nominal."
- 11—14. A few Brahmans hearing about the resuscitation of the dead kite, wished to test the sage out of curiosity, and set out early from their village. Reaching Mahuli, they announced their arrival to the King in order to see the sage. The Guru being informed said that he was going into the forest for shikar, and that he would return soon to receive the visitors. Meantime, the Brahmans who were entertained by the king awaited the sage eagerly, when he with a catapult hanging on his back, returned from the forest with his disciples.

- 15, 16. As the King was about to enquire, where he had been wandering, the sage told him he had been out hunting, and ordered his disciples to show him their bag. So they threw out of a net a heap of dead sparrows.
- 17—20. The King was disgusted to see this, and hung his head in shame. An intolerant man in the crowd began to jeer at Samartha, when the sage requested the Brahmans to spend a couple of days in the town. The latter having consented, he said to his disciple that they had to go to get alms, and ordered him to let the birds off so that they might return to their little ones. As the disciple was about to ask as to how the birds could fly when they had already been destroyed by him, Samartha said, "Spread out some hay over them and then set it on fire and they will all fly away." The disciple did as he was bid.
- 21, 22. The birds revived, slipped out of the burning hay and flew away instantly. The people stunned with amazement at this miracle, stared wide-eyed. Convinced of the sage's extraordinary powers achieved by a long penance, they fell at his feet abashed, and hanging their heads down, begged his forgiveness.
- 23, 24. One day, while King Shivaji was on his way to Mahableshwar, he heard that his Guru was somewhere on the hill. So on arrival there, he promptly set out with his followers carrying torches in search of the sage. But their wandering in the forest only ended in fatigue.
- 25, 26. Finally, he found himself alone in a dense wilderness. Utterly oblivious of food and drink, but intensely anxious to see his Guru, Shivaji continued wandering until he reached a solitary cave from within which he heard someone moaning with extreme pain.

27—30. He entered the cave instantly and found the sage on the ground, reeling with agony, as though his body was pierced with a spear. The King, extremely distressed, his heart melting with pity, asked his Guru the cause of his anguish and the latter replied with a groan, "What can I say about this unbearable pain in my stomach? I am dying. They say the only cure is tigress's milk. But where can I find it?" "I will go and get it. What could be more glorious than service rendered to one's Guru?" exclaimed Shivaji.

31, 32. So saying, the brave King though warned by his kind Guru, yet bent on finding the desired remedy, plunged fearlessly into the dense jungle with a vessel in hand. Prepared to barter his body for the cure to allay his Guru's anguish, he searched for it, until he reached a cave.

33—36. There he saw a couple of tiger cubs and was thrilled with joy. Drawing nearer, he caressed them, when he heard a terrific roar. All of a sudden, a tigress displaying her fangs, fell on him, and as she was about to destroy him, he appealed to her most tenderly, "Mother, I have not come here to kill you or steal your cubs. Be pleased, and let me milk you as my Guru needs your milk. If you wish to kill me for your feed or that of your little ones, you may do so after I have milked you. I have consecrated my body to my Guru."

37. So saying as he caressed the head of the beast, she began to lick him as gently as a cow. Indeed, even fierceness melts away by tenderness.

38, 39. Seeing this change of attitude, he milked her quickly and as soon as his vessel was filled, he bowed to her and went away delighted. He had hardly walked a few yards, when he heard a soft voice saying, "Well done, well done", and suddenly behind him appeared the sage like the sun emerging through a dense cloud.

40, 41. When he saw the King's garments torn by thorns and his body injured by the beast's fierce claws, the sage, amazed at his devotion, was moved to tears and embracing Shivaji, said, "Since you considered your own life a mere straw and entered this terrific forest, infested with deadly animals, the fire in my stomach too has been extinguished by the flow of the nectar of your devotion."

42, 43. When Shivaji returned to his capital, he was crowned King of the Maharashtra with all due rites, and he, as the sovereign of the entire southern country, became the delight of his people. Later, he went to Parali to see his Guru and spent a month with him happily, listening to the sage's work of Dasabodha.

44, 45. They were together all the time, spending every minute in solitude. Once Shivaji remained in Samadhi, until he was roused by his Guru. Subsequently, feeling by intuition that he might not see his Guru again after a few days, Shivaji was overcome with grief. A stream of tears flowed from his eyes.

46, 47. As he could not restrain himself, Samarthā pressed him to his bosom and said, "After being with me so long, have you not learnt self-restraint?" So saying the sage consoled him by explaining the essence of his own composition. Then, with a blessing he sent the King back to his capital.

48. Satisfying all his subjects alike by gifts of cattle, vast lands, and wealth, Shivaji now following the rules of rigorous fasting, found sole happiness in listening to Harikirtan.

49. One night, seated on a seat of kusha grass, while enjoying the recitation of the delightful epic, he suddenly uttered, "Rama ! Rama !" and in a moment, expired.
50. Hearing with profound grief that the valiant son of the Maharashtra was suddenly bereft of his brilliance like the sun at night, the sage murmured, "Mighty is the will of God." And grief-stricken, he never stirred out of his abode again.
51. His disciples, including Uddhava, kept silent, being most distressed to see their Guru remain at home day and night, utterly averse to seeing people.
52. Six months later, the revered sage, great as Vyasa, after completing the gems of his poetical works, the Dasabodha and others, and fulfilling both the commands of Rama, went to the realm of Maruti.
53. Thus, Shivaji and Ramdas after establishing Swarajya and the ancient faith by the force of their sword and intellect respectively, ascended Vaikuntha unhindered and were gladly welcomed by *Mukunda.
